The Unexpected Way Philosophy Majors Are Changing the World of Business

By Carolyn Gregoire

Dr. Damon Horowitz quit his technology job and got a Ph.D. in philosophy — and he thinks you should too.

"If you are at all disposed to question what's around you, you'll start to see that there are cracks in the bubble," Horowitz said. "So about a decade ago, I made decisions I've made in my life."

As Horowitz demonstrates, a degree in philosophy can be useful for professions beyond a job in academia. It gives like his can help in the business world. His story can pave the way for real change. After earning his PhD in philosophy from Stanford, he became an entrepreneur and Google's in-house philosopher/director of engineering. His own career is a testament to the value of a philosophy education.

Despite a growing media interest in the subject, philosophy is still frequently dismissed as outmoded and impractical, removed from the everyday world and relegated to the ivory tower.

That doesn't fit with the realities of the business and tech worlds, where philosophy has long been the cornerstone of great innovation. Philosophy and entrepreneurship are a surprisingly good fit. Some of the most successful tech entrepreneurs and innovators come from a philosophy background and put the critical thinking skills they developed to good use launching new digital services to fill needs in virtual worlds.

In fact, many leading tech entrepreneurs credit studying philosophy as the secret to their success as digital entrepreneurs.
